

Study in Italy

Studying in Italy provides the possibility of achieving a high-prestige degree in Italian universities and academies, recognized throughout Europe. In the OECD countries, education increases the probability of employment: on average, starting from 1997, unemployment rates have been directly linked to the population's average educational level. An Italian degree facilitates the search for stable employment at every level.

Italy is in the vanguard in every field of higher education, and in particular in the fields of design, architecture, applied sciences, and arts.

The current Italian university order, besides differentiating the education of students on the basis of real market needs, provides them with a more natural route to the world of employment, owing to the obligatory nature of training stages during academic studies. Studying in Italy provides many opportunities for growth and success, in academic life as well as in the world of employment.

Why study in Italy?

- No IELTS required
- No requirement of learning Italian at the time of admission.
- The average fees a student has to pay is somewhere between 850 euro and 1,000 euro per year since this varies from one university to another and also depends on the chosen course of study. Private universities are clearly much more expensive.
- Italy has played an important role in European higher education: it is one of the four countries that first engaged to create the so-called "European Area of Higher Education".
- Today Italy ranks among the 8 most industrialised countries in the world. Alongside some big companies, both state-owned and private, it has developed a sound network of small and medium-sized undertakings, promoted a few scientific parks, and is incentivating basic and applied research in a great variety of fields
