Top level authorities of a company should always take employee's suggestion or ideas to take any decision? Discuss and give your opinion.

Introduction:

Irrefutably, management of respective companies need to take instant and wise decisions in order to survive in highly competitive environment/world. Considering this, whether regulatory authorities must seek assistance from their employees in making any decision or not is a matter of debate. However, this essay will ascertain both sides of an argument before deducing a reasonable conclusion.

Body- 1st argument:

There is a variety of factors wherein the merits of engaging employees in decision making policy could be supported. First and foremost, up to date in core information could be a substantial factor to be considered. It is generally seen that staff working in their respective areas are well informed regarding ins and out of the processes to perform the daily tasks efficiently. Therefore, these individuals could come up with innovative ideas, which could be fruitful for the company. For example, an article published in a newspaper has revealed that 25% of a company's productivity has enhanced due to involving employees in decision making aspects. In addition, essence of teamwork may be another noteworthy element to take into an account.

Body- 2nd argument:

Despite the factors discussed above, non-engagement of workers in decision making power of an enterprise is even a crucial aspect. Confidentiality could be a significant/vital aspect. It may be defined as access to sensitive information to the entire organisation could have detrimental impacts on company's internal resources. Call tenders, financial documents and crucial strategies can be taken as some of the examples.

Conclusion:

Agree or disagree

Irrefutably, the amount of traffic especially in urban areas is rising dramatically day by day. Considering this, some analysts insist that there must be heavy taxes imposed on private vehicle owners in order to tackle the increasing issue of traffic. I staunchly agree with the above recommended proposal due to a notable reason.

There is a practical factors wherein the policy to impose taxes on private car owners may be beneficial to reduce traffic rate. Encouragement to use public transport could be a single most significant factor to be considered. It may be defined as the policy of taxing private car ownership will consequently discourage them to restrict such ease and will encourage using more public transport for commuting purposes. For example, a recent survey conducted in Asian countries has revealed that by implying the said policy, there was around 45% of traffic reduction in cities.

Despite the factors discussed above regarding to tax private car holders in order to mitigate the traffic in metropolitan areas, there are some groups who consider implying taxes on private car owners as negative step. Extra financial burden could be a single most important factor behind opponent's viewpoint. It is commonly believed that being a car owner is itself a huge amount of expense that the owners need to take care. If upon this, there will be some taxes to pay additionally; there are chances that people may suffer from financial crisis. No doubt, a fear of financial crisis could be true up to certain extent; however, it should also not to be forgotten that the rate of traffic congestion is increasing and the maintenance cost involved of such roads is also rising. If this is the case, would it be wise enough to not collect little chunk of tax from the users to maintain the wellbeing of this ease? My answer would be no.

In the end, unquestionably, there are huge expenses that people already need to tackle and the said policy of taxing private car ownership is quite disadvantageous for the users, however, I still believe that in order to tackle the issue of rising traffic congestion, there is just a single mode of solution to be adopted that is TAX.
