

Central Dogma

The central dogma is the central concept of the study of genetic materials. Central dogma says DNA creates a replica of itself for the safekeeping of genetic information. The same DNA then transfer the information to the RNA. Now the RNA gets hold of the information and creates some practically useful structures. How? RNA translates the information to form a polypeptide chain or protein. Proteins are the most active biomolecules in our cells.