

Traditionally, learning a new language meant that you could land a job with an Embassy or the tourism sector. However, with the ever increasing globalization, companies in the IT sector, MNC banks and export houses are looking for a large number of people who can work with them as language experts.

With a large number of companies from non-English speaking countries spotting India for outsourcing work, they have started hunting for people proficient in Spanish, German, French and other foreign languages to support the clientele and the salary package for language experts could be 25% to 40% more than English speaking counterparts.

Expansion of Your Opportunities

The majority of Latin American countries speak Spanish as their native language, with an increasingly large and growing Hispanic community now also living in the US, which means Spanish language covers nearly an entire hemisphere. In Europe, Spanish is spoken in Spain and is only slightly different from the Latin American Spanish, which means that learning one makes the other much easier to pick up.
